Christopher Wool moved to New York from Chicago when he was 18. He was interested in the gritty aesthetic of city life as well as the anarchic Punk and No Wave movements flourishing throughout New York City during the '70s and '80s. His practice spans many mediums including photography, film, music, and painting.

Wool's word paintings feature enigmatic phrases stenciled in block letters against a stark white background. The resulting smudges, drips, and erratic spacing from the spray-painting process push words towards abstract shapes and create distance between the viewer and the artist. Wool is interested in the ways different environments can recontextualize familiar language. He gravitates towards words and phrases that can feel tense or ominous.
